I remember 2 yearss ago, I went to the local zoo as part of a school expedition. We spent most of the day there and saw many different animals, and we learned a lot about them for the class project we were doing. There was one white tiger there and it was my favorite animal, so I'll talk about it.

answering first 2 questions

It was in a large cage, which was full of enormous rocks and some large trees too. It was bigger than I thought it would be, but then I was only a child at the time. I'd seen plenty of tigers on TV, in movies and TV programs, but it seemed a lot bigger in real life. It was really like watching a big cat, the way it moved around. The colors were amazing, the yellow, white and black stripes on its body were spectacular.

what it look like 1:

★ As I was watching, it jumped up and started climbing up one of the big rocks. When it reached the top it slowly turned around and then looked down at everything, moving its head from side to side, like it was observing everything going on around it. I felt very excited because I thought it was looking at me, it was really wonderful! ★ However, once I went back to the zoo last year with my nephew, he asked me where that tiger's friend are. That question shocked me totally. I came to realise that the tiger might be very lonely. It might needs company just like I do. If I were trapped here and forced to performance for the humans, how sad I were. The tiger in the zoo made me feel upset that day. From that day on, I think wild animals should be in the wild, and they belong to the nature.
