

Describe a book you want to read again

1. What the book was about
2. Why you read it in the first place
3. What you learned from the book
4. and explain why you would like to read it again

In terms of a book I want to read again, I think it should be Harry Potter. It's no accident or marketing trick that HP became an international best selling phenomenon. It is an extremely good series of books. I first read it in 2015 as a birthday gift from my sister. It is an amazing magic story composed by author's imagination.

What I have learnt: British speaking, English words. (expand now...)

I have learnt the British way to speak and a lot of English words. The author J.K. Rowling was born in Yate, England so she has a good British English background. Funny enough, in her novels, she often uses very English conversation. I still remember Mr and Mrs Dursley say "We are proud to say that we are perfectly normal, thank you very much." Besides this, I also found a lot of words to express speak, such as whispered Harry, Ron murmured. It is easy to remember these uncommon words when you are in some specific context.

please say 'thank you very much loudly'. Your examiner will totally understand this very English way.

Although I have known all the plots, yet I want to read it again. I treat it as a form of escaping. I want to be transported to different worlds far away from the drudgery of the real one. And the world of Hogwarts is so vivid, rich, fantastical and fleshed-out. So want to revisit it every now and again. It's just like inviting an old friend round for tea.

Only one reason: escaping. Question 3 takes 1 min already

drudgery

hard menial or dull work.
And then there are folks like Wesselman-Pierce who just want a break from the drudgery of real life.
