If I could take a weekend trip anywhere in the world as a future plan, I would visit Tokyo. I live in Beijing, which is one of the easternmost places in China. This means that I am relatively close, from a geographical point of view to my destination, and I can reach it by car and boat. I want to visit the capital of Japan because I read so much about it and I find it's culture fascinating, despite the fact that the Japanese people borrowed a lot of cultural elements from us. I want to see what travel guides refer to as "the old ways joining the new", to visit a Buddhist altar there, to see the snow on top of Mount Fuji and above all, to experience the authentic cuisine. I know it is similar to ours, but I would like to see what all the fuss is all about. I want to take a lot of photos and use them in a school project due for next month. That would also make this experience an asset to my academic formation, and would constitute an argument in favour of this trip when I plead with my parents. However, I don't see them giving me either the permission or the money to undergo such a journey anytime soon. Plus, going over there without adult supervision is definitely out of the question. I will have to do this when I have my stable income.
